I am building a relational database and am struggling with the way to model a database that would have a number of hierarchal levels of tables, something like this: User User1 User2 User3 Team Team1 Team2 Roster Roster1 Roster2 In that case, Roster and User would both be one-to-many, with User having many Roster and each Roster having one or more Users, like so: User User1 Roster1 User1 Roster2 User2 Roster1 User2 Roster2 User3 Roster1 User3 Roster2 I have seen this kind of model described as one of the many hierarchical models available, such as nested sets and tree structures. I am wondering if there is a name for this kind of model and if I should use it or something else? I have seen this kind of model described as one of the many hierarchical models available, such as nested sets and tree structures. I am wondering if there is a name for this kind of model and if I should use it or something else? A: You should use a "junction" table to relate the "Children" to their "Parent". The same is true for the "GrandChildren" "GrandParent" and so on. I hope the following schemata explains: Code: CREATE TABLE User (Id INT NOT NULL PRIMARY KEY, Name VARCHAR(50), FK_User_Team INT FOREIGN KEY REFERENC f678ea9f9e
